

Following are the behavioral tips for Curate Personalized Recommendations:

Curate Personalized Recommendations
1.	Identify a product, service or solution based on what's important to the customer and the emotional information you've gathered (Examples: payment options, online inventory, custom, etc.) - Honor the price point the customer expressed they would like to spend (if they shared it with you) - Recommend jewelry based on their style preferences vs. categories - Provide options versus saying "no" - Partner or turn-over to another team member when you are unable to meet the customer's needs. When doing so use caution to ensure the customer understands that you are bringing in another team member to help meet their needs versus not wanting to assist them; stay with the customer and the new team member when possible
2.	Adjust your presentation (pace, focus, empathy) to meet the customer's needs based on the emotional information you observed
3.	Provide accurate product knowledge Offer personalization and custom
4.	Present value by giving features, benefits and check questions that are personalized to that specific customer - Use features, benefits and check questions that reference the customer's story to demonstrate you've heard them and to personalize benefits that meet their needs - Highlight sentiment, quality, durability, beauty, uniqueness and service features that build value in our products and services and are meaningful to the customer - Never lead with price, discount or promotion discount or you risk damaging trust and building a lifetime relationship with that customer - Look for symbols and use romance language to help connect the jewelry to the customer's story Note: This could be the start of Closing the Sale for purchasing situations
5.	Observe the customer's physical and emotional reaction to the jewelry or service presented
6.	If the customer expresses agreement or positive verbal/non-verbal cues, move on to trial close - Use a series of close-ended questions to ask for decisions on minor selling points (do you like the style, do you like the size, etc.) - Look for a few yeses to your questions. "No's" aren't bad but they do tell us we have more work to do to find the perfect jewelry or service - Revisit payment options

7. If the customer expresses hesitation or concern, ask additional open-ended questions & identify a solution to their concern (e.g. overcome objections with payment options, online inventory, etc.)

- For shopping customers and customers making a return:
 - If the concern is about the style:
 - Suggest another piece from your case that eliminates the concern or dislike
 - Show another piece from your endless aisles of online inventory that eliminates the concern
 - Create a piece of jewelry using custom design if available
 - If the concern is about price:
 - Offer payment options
 - Show similar merchandise within the price point
 - Highlight the rarity, durability, and master craftsmanship
- For warranty and repair customers if the concern is about price:
 - Offer payment options
 - Highlight the benefit of the repair and our experienced artisans to the customer

Note: The goal of overcoming objections is not to convince the customer that they want something they don't, it's to hear their concern and to find a solution or piece of jewelry that meets their needs

Elevated Behaviors

- Encourage the customer to try on or hold the jewelry
- Include the customer's name, recipient's name and occasion in your conversation
- Practice active listening - listen without interrupting; nod, take notes and maintain focus on the customer and respond to or summarize what you heard and understood
- Present complementary/matching pieces to both service and shopping customers
- Find a way to say yes to the perfect piece of jewelry or solution for your customer. If we don't have the piece in store, find it online or from a vendor, explore making it using custom jewelry design or find it at a sister store